An Energy Check in the Cafeteria

On Thursday, Hana's class began an energy check in the cafeteria.

The students listed 7 lights or devices that used electricity during one lesson.

They used a timer to collect a reading without changing any settings.

Next, the class switched off unused equipment and waited ten minutes.

A second reading was lower, while the room remained bright enough for students to work.

Hana marked both readings on a bar graph with matching units.

The class proposed a reminder card beside the door for the last person leaving the room.

Their teacher approved a one-week trial before the class would measure again.
