Cataloging Community Languages

During late spring, Valerie joined a study at the neighborhood cultural center to document languages used in community signs.

The team marked 11 samples with dates and locations so later comparisons would use the same evidence.

Researchers collected observations with photographs and location notes and wrote the measurement conditions beside every result.

Before drawing a conclusion, the group checked unusual values and repeated one observation with a second reader.

The combined evidence showed that grocery streets displayed the widest range of languages.

Because one comparison alone could not explain every difference, the team recorded a limitation in its report.

After discussing that limitation, Valerie recommended that the group interview shop owners about translation choices.

The final report linked each claim to its source data so another team could evaluate the reasoning.
